The oldest known image of a brewery in Washington is from George Cooke's 1833 painting, "City of Washington from Beyond the Navy Yard." The Washington brewery is the tall brick building on the Anacostia River. Clement Coote owned the brewery at the time. Library of Congress

A WORD OF CAUTION: The centuries have made many grave markers and sites unstable. Please be careful near grave markers and watch where you step: depressions and sink holes lie hidden in grass, and footstones and corner markers can trip the unwary.

Walking Tour

Brewers Tour

History comes to life in Congressional Cemetery. The creak and clang of the wrought iron gate signals your arrival into the early decades of our national heritage. Surrounding you are the men and women who shaped the new capital and gave substance to the new nation: congressmen and tradesmen, diplomats and domestics, explorers and architects, soldiers and musicians. And brewers. Brewers were once the second-largest employer in Washington after the federal government. Early brewers were often English immigrants who focused on producing ale. The Washington Brewery, which operated near Navy Yard from 1805 to 1836, had numerous owners. Brewing grew dramatically after the 1850s once German immigrants settled in Washington and introduced lager, a more palatable beer for Washington's hot, humid summers. George Beckert was one of the first to produce lager locally. Local Prohibition in 1917 shut down two major breweries on Capitol Hill: the Washington Brewery (where Stuart-Hobson Middle School now stands), and the National Capital Brewing Company on 14th Street, SE. This latter site was home to a long series of breweries, starting with Beckert's Park in the 1850s. During Prohibition, it became an ice cream factory, then was torn down in the 1960s. It's now the Safeway, just three blocks from here. Along with Prospect Hill Cemetery, Congressional Cemetery today has the lion's share of historic Washington brewers.
